COMMON SENSE VS. SPASMS.

They were married. The ceremony which made two husband and wife was over—with the benediction pronounced—the crisp new greenback, with a C in each of the four corners, transferred from the pocket of the bridegroom to the sensitive palm of the officiating clergyman. Godspeed and congratulations followed each other in quick succession from the assembled friends—and now Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Lathrop were to start immediately upon their wedding trip. The mother of the bride—an elegantly dressed lady, with an exceedingly small, tapering waist, and a very large bust—cried a little at first—but a few lady-like tears—and then fell fainting into the arms of her husband. This so overwhelmed the newly made wife that she also fainted over, and Mr. Lathrop, who had never witnessed such a scene before, made a frantic dash for the silk lining which confined Mrs. Lathrop's white silk waist—which strangely enough operated like magic on the fair swain—who lifted her head immediately, and said—at the same time firmly protesting with her kidded fingers—

"Oh, no, darling; don't do that! I am better now. How is ma? Dear Ma!"

"She's all right now," replied Mr. Lathrop heartily. "Mercy! if I'd had the least notion of such a scene as this, I don't know as I should have dared attempt the ceremony. Be careful you don't do this over again, ladies," he continued, trying to laugh off the annoyance caused by the拙劣的 performance.

"I am very easily frightened, and a repetition of this would scare me out of my wits."

Poor Samuel Lathrop! Little did he know what awaited him! His courtship had been a short one of six months. The usual round of opera, theater, lecture, and an occasional evening at home, had been gone through with—after the fashion of New York lovers in high life. He noticed that Kitty always objected to walking, and this little indication of delicate health on the part of his "dearest girl," instead of opening his eyes to the true condition of things, only served to develop more tenderness in his heart for the fragile creature so soon to be his—forever. This was the first time he had seen her faint, although he was aware that Kitty's mother was quite up to this sort of thing. He had been a little puzzled to reconcile Mrs. Penn's confirmed invalidism with her attendance at every party of the season, and the performance of the rest of the duties (?) so incumbent upon society women. But love had shut both eyes in the evening, and business had kept love's eyes closed all day, and the result—w h, never mind; that will come soon enough. It was not without visible signs of trepidation that Mr. Lathrop seated himself beside his wife in the carriage which was to convey them to the railway station.

"A very pleasant party," said Kitty after the last good-bye was said, and the last white handkerchief lost sight of.

"It would have been very pleasant for the last act in the tableau—the fainting scene. That pretty nearly spoiled everything for me," replied the truthful husband, entirely unaware that he was treading upon sacred ground.

"Spoiled everything! Now isn't that awful mean to talk so to your little wife because she felt badly at leaving mother?" and the beautiful eyes which Samuel had kissed times without number looked pleadingly up into his face; but Mr. Lathrop was a very determined man when he once made up his mind to pursue any subject, and just now this fainting business was very unpleasant before him. Some way, he was unable to shake it off, so putting the pink check, as he wistfully turned towards him, he

"Yes, Kitty, it was natural enough and proper enough to feel sad at parting from your mother, but you don't faint every time you are grieved or annoyed about anything, do you?"

"Why no, Sam; I don't faint every time—of course not; but I do sometimes! Everybody with weak nerves and delicate constitutions is liable to swoons and spasms," the doctor says.

"Swoons and spasms!—swoon and spasms!" repeated poor Sam in desperation. "You haven't weak nerves and a delicate constitution, have you?"

"Why, I suppose so, yes," answered Kitty, wondering. "Ma has always been delicate, and I have never been strong since I commenced to go into society. I was well enough before that when we lived on the farm. I was as strong and hearty as any little girl. But what's the matter Sam? you act as though you were disappointed about something. I wouldn't have fainted dear, if I could have helped it."

"No; I shouldn't suppose there would be much fun in such work. I am a little disappointed, Kitty. I want my wife to have perfect, robust health, and I shall see that she has, too. I never could be happy with a sickly, peevish, nervous, swooning wife—never in the world! I doubt if I could get on with her at all."

"Why, no—of course not," said Kitty, with an affectionate little pull at his whiskers. "But then if you love her, Sam, as dearly as you love me, you could condone everything, you know, but I shall never be one of that kind—I shall be just as good as I can anyway."

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Lathrop, after a few weeks of pleasant sojourn, returned to the city; the young wife obedient to her husband's wishes, but entirely contrary to her own, took charge of her own model establishment. As may be supposed, for such a position she was entirely unfitted. The domestic part of her education had been utterly neglected—her mother trusting to the chance of a rich marriage to insure freedom from all household care.

Sam Lathrop had money enough, but he had very old fashioned notions about the duties of a wife. He was not the man, however, to allow her to degenerate into a drudge; but he did believe that every woman should know enough about domestic matters to see that an establishment was kept in proper order, and in case of a sudden hoisting of servants, to understand sufficiently about the cook to prepare a respectable meal of victuals.

Extremely old fogeyish, of course; but then Mr. Lathrop was very honest in this matter, and therefore, to a certain extent, pardonable.

Kitty surveyed the cosy and elegant establishment with feelings which she herself would have been puzzled to analyze. She could not fail to see that the brain contriving and arranging all the comforts and luxuries was not only calculated by nature and education to appreciate the beautiful, but had for its foundation a fund of practical common sense rarely met with. So Mrs. Lathrop, while she could not fail to be charmed with the taste and resources, financial and intellectual, of her husband, was nevertheless awed by the depth of his knowledge on domestic subjects.

"How did you come to know so much about household matters, Sam?" inquired Mrs. Lathrop, after having made with her husband a visit to every room, closet and pantry in the house.

"I had a good mother, Kitty—where highest ambition for her son was that he make a good husband."

For a moment Kitty's bright face was clouded; then she said slowly and distinctly—

"I have a good mother, too, Sam—but she never said anything to me about making a good wife. Some way, dear, it don't seem to me I have been properly educated for such a man as you."

"But there's time enough, Kitty. You are young, and a little care and study is all that is necessary—and considerable patience. I almost forgot that. Patience in the learning of a trade is the most important quality, afterall."

"Oh, dear! it tries me so to think about it, that I wish we hadn't thought of housekeeping. It would have been a great deal better for us both if we had boarded a few years, I don't know anything about housekeeping, and I don't think I am strong enough ever to learn. Sam, you never should have married me."

Then followed a burst of hysterical tears, which for a few moments caused the young husband to forget everything but how he could best dispel the clouds which he inadvertently sowed of ascertaining how the last hour's work had affected him. There was nothing to be seen there but perfect kindness and tenderness; and Kitty closed her tired eyes and went fast asleep.

"Now, what is your theory about this case, doctor?" inquired Sam, fired with a determination to know what it all meant.

"I'll tell you, my boy. This little wife of yours is more sinned against than sinning, in my opinion. That's what's the matter with her. Now, the question is, have you grit and patience enough to undo the work of all these years? It will take both; but if you love her, as I have no doubt you do—as a thoughtful fellow like you must have done to have married—

"you will be able to plow through and come out conqueror. But I warn you that the job is a tough one. Now, did this thing meet when you ripped it off?" continued the doctor, holding up the deitily embroidered corset.

"I am sure I don't know," replied Sam. "All I know is that, when I cut the infidel string, it went off like a pistol."

"Exactly. Well, the truth is, Sam, that your wife, in the endeavor to cheat Nature out of her rights, has compressed her waist with lacing, that she has actually lapped her ribs. I found that out in my examination and then took here," picking up a slipper, which might have belonged to Cinderella. "This shoe is probably large enough for Mrs. Lathrop, but take a squat at that heel—an inch and a half in height, and clear in the middle of the foot, by George! Now, do you know what this sort of a thing does for the wearer? It throws the body entirely off its equilibrium, and in that way puts everything out of gear—weak back, dislocated nerves, compressed lungs, abnormal circulation, and swoons and spasms," as a matter of course. Talk about the Chinese! No wonder! Now the question is, have you courage enough to join hands with me in an attempt to make this wife of yours entirely ours? It can be done, but as I said before, it is a tough job."

"Yes, sir? I think I have. Try me and see," and the physician went to work. His first move was to write down a list of articles which the invalid was not to eat or drink—coffee, tea, spices, candy, pastry, cake, and nuts, were positively forbidden. After this followed a sensible bill of fare, full and delicious enough for the palate of an epicure, but, of course, just the kind of food detested by the debilitate Kitty. A lady teacher of vocal and physical gymnastics was recommended to give daily lessons to the invalid, and so on; directions were given even to the veriest toilette trifles. When Kitty awoke the doctor had gone, and her husband sat by her bedside reading. Mrs. Penn, now quietly recovered, reclined in her daughter's rocker, awaiting results.

"You are better, aren't you, darling?" and the anxious mother bent over and kissed the pale face of her child. "Now you must have something nourishing, right away! I'll ring the bell, and give you a good strong cup of tea first. That will steady your nerves, and then you can order anything you think you can take good."

Mrs. Penn's hand was upon the bell, when her son-in-law interrupted with—the doctor has strictly forbidden tea, Mrs. Penn. What would you like to have Kitty, in the place of it?" and Mr. Lathrop drew the bright head upon his arm, and tenderly smoothed back the hair from her beautiful forehead.

"But, Sam, I have always had tea after these turns," said Kitty, with a glance at her mother.

"Yes, dear, but the old regime is over. You love me, do you not darling?"

"Why, yes, Sam? Love you? I guess I do!"

"And you trust me?"

"Would I have married you, if I hadn't trusted you?"

"Then, of course, you believe I seek your very best good—your highest happiness?"

"Of course I do, Sam."

"Well, then, my love, you can't have any tea, and you must do as I say. I don't want to be your master, but I am your husband and your friend; and if you love me you will be entirely guided by what the doctor says, and by my wife, too."

"Why, Sam, I will do anything in the world to please you! I will learn how to make sweetmeat and pickles, and how to broil a steak nicely, and make bread. Oh, you old darling! You are ever so much too wise for such a little shallow, sickly thing as I am."

"You are willing to become a sensible woman for my sake?"

"If I can," was the artless reply. "And leave off these things?" holding up the unfortunate corsets?

"Why, Sam are they hurtful?"

"They have deformed you, that's all. May I put them in the fire?"

"Oh, no, Sam! I wouldn't burn them. They are new, and nice, and might fit somebody smaller than I, who couldn't afford to buy them. But I will never wear them again, if you don't want me to."

"Tears stood in the earnest man's eyes. Ah, that little darling was well worth saving. That though for another touched the noble heart of the husband more deeply than did her expressions of love for him even, and Kitty wondered why it was that Sam seemed to love her so much more than ever before.

"And these things, Kitty—holding up the tiny slippers. "Do you think for my sake and your health's sake, that you can wear shoes that don't throw your body entirely out of shape?"

"Why Sam, are they hurtful, too?" and now Kitty's brown eyes expressed unmistakable surprise. "Why, then, I never should have worn them; could I?"

"Never, my darling!"

"Mrs. Penn looked on in bewilderment.

"Now, Sam," continued the little heroine her face all aglow, "there is my hand—ten thousand times more yours than it was the day the minister married us. I will obey you and the doctor in every single thing. I will make the very best use of my poor resources if you only show me how. My ambition is to be just the wife you would have me. This is all I can do, Sam. Are you satisfied?"

"Perfectly!" and the young husband told the truth.

"I guess I'll go now, Kitty; you are so much better," said the mother-in-law, evidently subdued by the loving atmosphere of the room. "Send me if you need me"—which Kitty promised to do.

So far the programme has been successfully carried out, and there hasn't been a swoon or a spasm since.—By LUCILLE KIRK.

Poetry.

THERE'S BLUE SKY OVERHEAD.

The earth is dark and drear,

There are clouds in the way ;

A thousand little trials

To encounter every day ;

But though full of grey and gloom

The path our feet may tread,

Look up, traveller,

There's blue sky overhead!

We journey to the right,

And we journey to the left;

And strive to find the treasures

Of which we are bereft;

When hope has ceased to smile,

And the heart is filled with dread,

Look up, traveller!

There's blue sky overhead!

The shadows dark may lay

All round us like a pall;

And on sad and sombre scenes

May our level glances pass;

But above the things of earth

Is Love's azure curtain spread,

Look up, traveller!

There's blue sky overhead!

The summer days go by,

With sweet memories in their train.

The autumn days are grey;

And the winter days are dreary;

But when dear delights are past,

And the joys of earth seem fled,

Look up, traveller!

There's blue sky overhead!

Though under-foot the thorns

And briars may abound,

Though death and desolation

Encompass us around,

Though all the springtime dry

That once our pleasures fed,

Look up, traveller,

There's blue sky overhead.

If motive were always visible, men would often blush for the most brilliant action.

They are fools who persist in being quite miserable because they are not quite happy...

Genius is the wand of an enchantress; greatest, the strength of a giant.

QU'APPELLE.

...Vote for Mr. G. S. Davidson:
—Messrs. J. F. D. Heppenstall and W. H. Charlesworth have located on their farm.
—Agricultural prize lists occupy much of our space this week to the exclusion of other matter.

—Messrs. Russell & Davis, butchers, have leased the old Lansdowne Hall and have fitted it up for their business.

—Messrs. Russell & Davis, butchers, of this town, have opened out a branch of their business in Prince Albert.

—Mr. G. S. Davidson will poll a majority of the votes in all the polling places in the district except two. Help roll up his majority.

—Dr. C. E. Cartiher is digging a cellar and will erect a new store for his drug business next south of Messrs. Milliken & Co.'s harness shop.

—Mr. W. D. Perley, M. N. W. C. for Qu'Appelle district was in town on Tuesday evening. He went west by the evening train to attend the Council meeting which opened yesterday.

—The patent process flour manufactured by D. H. McMillan & Bro., at the Qu'Appelle Roller Mills, took first prize at Regina, being exhibited by J. S. Donahue. Their strong bakers was also the best exhibited, but the judges had to give the Regina mill one first prize, of course.

We understand that the Qu'Appelle Brass Band will make their debut on Friday next. They are expected to play in the morning at 11 o'clock on the Fair Ground and in the afternoon at 14 o'clock in front of the Immigration Buildings.

—George L. Garnett was tried in Regina on the 7th inst for the robbery of the Prince Albert mail. The jury after an hour's deliberation, brought in a verdict of guilty, and the judge sentenced him to fourteen years in the penitentiary. It is said that the prisoner still declares he is not guilty, and hopes that time and circumstances will establish his innocence.

—The Phoenix is the first newspaper to appear with the first report of the proceedings of the North-West Council now in Session. Its enterprise in securing at considerable expense telegraphic report which appears on our first page is an indication of the determination of the publisher to furnish the best and most complete report of the proceedings of our Legislature.

—The meeting of the electors here on Tuesday evening to hear the candidates for the vacant seat in the North-West Council was very largely attended, the large room in the immigrant building being well filled. Mr. Crawford and Mr. Davidson, the candidates, both addressed the meeting, and there was a senseless wrangle over the posted voters' list. Mr. W. D. Perley was present and addressed the meeting. The meeting broke up with a vote of thanks to A. M. McLane, who acted as chairman.
